

STIMSON

The last few decades have witnessed the greatest mass exodus out of poverty in human history. The forces of globalization have increased economic opportunities worldwide and, in turn, helped elevate the overall human condition. However, at the same time, the undercurrents of globalization, including illicit networks and activities, have also increased the potential for widespread proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. Not only does this threaten an increasingly violent future, a WMD incident anywhere in the world promises to reverse the very benefits of globalization itself. On May 31, 2011, the Permanent Missions of Japan, Poland and Turkey to the United Nations, in cooperation with the Stimson Center, hosted a day-long conference on the proliferation challenges facing the international community. The meeting, which featured UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, explored the linkages between security challenges and development objectives by focusing on how disarmament and nonproliferation capacity-building can reinforce global economic development and sustainable economic growth.

Today's follow-up meeting will focus on regional approaches to nonproliferation and capacity-building. Representatives of member states, regional experts, and UN Committee officials will explore targeted regional approaches and innovative strategies to address the proliferation dilemma, as well as overarching steps that should be taken by the international community to improve adherence to nonproliferation standards worldwide, while ensuring unfettered economic growth and development. With the participation of industry representatives, panels will discuss the challenges of implementing effective export and border control measures, and the need for international cooperation. By considering proliferation a threat to both security and development and recognizing the positive impact nonproliferation and disarmament efforts can have on socio-economic stability, discussants will explore opportunities to address the wide range of concerns facing the international community related to the proliferation of nuclear, biological and chemical weapons of mass destruction.
